, cameras, tablets, kitchenware and other stuff worth $800 plus. ~~~ EvanKelly I think I'm misunderstanding, are you saying that the deal is on the interest alone or are you saying that it's worth $800 in the "stuff" but the $800 is part of the whole package? michaelbuddy It's $800 upfront, you must pay the $1,200 in four months in addition to making the $2,500 payment. ----- femto113 I know the only line on my credit card for food and fuel is that for purchases that are "medically necessary." And my insurer will only cover me for what they consider "medically necessary" to treat what they consider "medically necessary." So a heart attack means you can't buy new tires, but my car actually needs new tires and is a medical necessity. And while I'm not going to buy a new car until I sell this old car, I'm still going to pay the $800 out of pocket. I agree that this should be an opt-in, and a choice should be made between paying $800 or something else. But it should not be a consequence of not paying $800. jdietrich >And my insurer will only cover me for what they consider "medically necessary." This is almost certainly the product of market segmentation. Insurance is likely to charge more for a new car than for a hospital visit. It's also highly unlikely that a heart condition is easily or cheaply tested. Finally, the formulary for a private insurance policy tends to be quite narrow, and insurers are often over-reliant on medication. >And while I'm not going to buy a new car until I sell this old car, I'm still going to pay the $800 out of pocket. Fraud may be one motivation. Private health insurance is rife with these cases. chadgeidel > Insurance is likely to charge more for a new car than for a hospital visit. The problem I'm having is that the difference in price is not always apparent. A hospital visit is an event. A car is something you do everyday (mostly) without further thought. > It's also highly unlikely that a 82157476af
